

I met a young lady called Lisa Hunt a week after she had had a nasty accident – a kettle-full of boiling water had poured over her fore-arm leaving, quite predictably, severe scalding. She became a hospital outpatient – having her dressing changed every day. Upon meeting her I stressed the benefits of using aloe vera gelly to dress the wound and the drinking gel to boost the body's ability to heal itself. She did as I suggested and every day when the dressing was changed the aloe vera was applied before the new bandage, and she also drank 120ml of gel daily. The before and after photos speak for themselves – the quality of the heal is unquestionable, with only very slight discoloration of the skin (you have to know it's there and look for it to see it!). Not only that, but the hospital staff were amazed at the speed of the healing process – the bandages were removed a full week before initially anticipated. And, as an added bonus, Lisa found that by drinking the gel she felt “more alive” and her general complexion was better than ever! Had Lisa used the products from the moment the accident had happened, there is every chance that the results would have been even more impressive! So, the products used, whilst at the un-glamorous end of the product range, have proved once again that they are immeasurably valuable as part of first aid and continued treatments and it should be our first instinct to reach for them if and when we sustain any form of injury.
